I went on a little Nordic ski up to heather lake today. Up higher the snowpack is so weak it could barely support my 150 lb body on skis, and I spent a great deal of time wallowing through two feet of facets. There was a widespread, thin layer of hoar frost throughout a good deal of the basin, mainly out in the open. I got one relatively large collapse as I stepped out in the open near heather lake, and then 5-6 smaller ones as I looped around above it.
